Lead sources

Discussion

Hey all, I'm currently reviewing my marketing plan for next year and really want to allocate some funds towards online leads.

I don't like doing open houses and I don't really mind making calls and talking to people so I figured online leads would be a good way to go.

My team already supplies me with Leads from Zillow flex but I want to not rely on that and generate my own leads.

Has anybody worked with a specific marketing company or lead gen company out there that has been relatively a good ROI?

From what I've researched it looks like Google PPC and YouTube ads are my best bet for running ads. I've tried Facebook a bunch, but I haven't seen success with that and low quality leads.

I'd appreciate any insight on what has worked for your business. TIA

if you have a rolodex of past clients i would consistently market towards SOI and past clients. My past clients get direct mail every month a gift every 2 months for 18 months and i call them ever quarter. I've been in RE for two years and so far this year i've gotten 10 referrals from past clients

That sounds like it can get very expensive. What types of gifts are you sending?

my closing gift is normally around $200 The nine gifts over the course of 18 months cost me $325 and every time I get a referral into escrow I get them a wine basket that normally cost me around 125 but I also send a $10 gift card to Starbucks anytime I get a referral. If the average commission in my area is $12,000 this is well worth it.

They're all small gifts through my marketing company so they handle it but it's like a door mat sketch of the home a nice ice cream scooper a nice bottle opener

Google PPC is a great lead source! It is scalable, predictable and customizable.

Expectations are also key, so I would recommend checking out this article, "[Real Estate PPC – The Definitive Guide \[2025 Edition\]](#)". It goes into detail about which campaigns work best, cost per lead, follow-up, etc.

Google PPC and YouTube ads can work really well if your targeting is dialed in, especially when you're focusing on intent-based keywords. Facebook tends to bring in cheaper clicks, but like you said, lead quality can be hit or miss. Some agents mix paid ads with smaller, verified lead sources to balance volume and intent, those tend to give better follow-up results. I've seen a few people mention trying SiftlyLeads for that kind of pre-qualified approach, though it's still smart to test with small budgets first. The best setup is usually a blend of your own ads and consistent follow-up with leads who've already shown motivation.

Look into real geeks

Realtor

You will get a greater return on that than you will trying to go at yourself. And it's a very reasonable price for what they provide. Do yourself a favor, go to the websites of top brokers in your area, the ones that are killing it, and at the bottom of the page, you will see something like "powered by real geeks, or cinc, or some other crm". Those companies get results. And if you want to know what it is that they are doing differently than you, they've outsourced lead gen to a third party. You say it's expensive, and it's not cheap, but it's an investment. When you go to figure out Google ppc and you have to come up with your keywords, keep this in mind, my crm manages my ppc and I have over 2900 keywords working for me. And I'm telling you, the results are there.

1 · Award · Share · ...

smeyers05 OP · 6mo ago

Are you currently using real geeks then? I've looked into CINC and YLOPO and a few others.

1 · Award · Share · ...

Mtolivepickie · 6mo ago
Realtor

No, a lot of other brokers are, but real geeks is known to be really good at what they do. Some of the top people in my area use real geeks. They are a sister company to cinc. Real geeks is the cheaper alternative to cinc but yields fantastic results

PPC is a solid one for me. FB has always been a hit or miss for me

Maybe try performance based lead partners so you are not paying big upfront or try dealjoy if you want to get leads from specific zip codes

You can build a stack that has inbound and outbound together meaning you can generate content, post it on social media as well as run ads to point prospects to a website and/or funnel. The good part is that you build something that's scalable and you own it. This can easily be achieved working with the right partner to put the tools together and find your ideal client where they hang out.

Google PPC and YouTube ads are both solid options, especially if you don't mind handling calls and follow-ups yourself. They take some tweaking to get the targeting right, but the intent from Google leads tends to be higher than Facebook's. Facebook can still work for brand awareness, but the lead quality usually drops unless you have strong local targeting. If you're running your own campaigns, start small and test different audiences before scaling up. Some agents also mix in off-market data or niche lead lists to balance out paid ads. I've seen tools like REI Data Solutions help with that side--fresher data can make your ad spend more effective. Either way, tracking your cost per conversation is key to figuring out what's really worth keeping.

If you don't know how to get real estate leads, generating local real estate leads through LSAs (Local Service Ads) are a good starting point.

Google's Local Service Ads (LSAs) are a paid placements in Google's search results for local queries. Example: "real estate agent New Jersey".

Your profile appears in the top search results, and potential customer can then text you or call you, depending on your preferences.

This allows you to immediately reach local customers that show a strong purchase intent in your services.

Unlike other ad platforms like Meta or regular Google Ads where you pay every time your ad is seen or clicked; with Local Service Ads, you only pay when you get a lead (aka. a text message or phone call), making it easy to project your costs and ROI.

If a call was made by mistake, you can dispute that charge with Google, and get a refund. That's guaranteed leads.

I wrote a full article where I list my personal 20 favourite lead sources for realtors (not sure I can share the link here, so DM me and I'll share it with you).

Online leads can be a good shout! Def consider where you wanna focus, like social media or search engines, etc. Think about content that'll attract folks naturally - show off your expertise, y'know? Maybe blog posts, short vids, or helpful guides? Gotta test different approaches to see what brings in the best peeps, though. Don't be afraid to experiment! And remeber tracking results is key, so you can see whats workin'. Good luck with it!

I would suggest calling the buyers you closed and ask for 2 referrals of great people just like them.

Love on all of them, one client has referred 17 people over 5 years/ Take them to lunch or dinner once a year!

Try GLS , well worth the investment if you take the time to learn it . YouTube University

Run Facebook Ads 1x a month - not always the best for leads but great for Brand Recognition/ $100 is enough, it's your own TV channel

- Utilize social media - I don't get a ton but I get enough 4-6 a year
- FARM an apartment building- mail postcard's because leases expires every day ! Approx 6 a year
- Don't bother to go to Realtor.com or Home Depot.com
- Learn to fish you will eat for a life time

Hope this helps'

I run a call center that calls for agents and we see basically every lead source under the sun. Nothing convert quite like Zillow Flex, but Google PPC and Meta ads can have some great ROI if you have a solid follow up plan in place. For Meta Ads I think services like StreetText or Walled Garden give you 90% of the benefit at a great price. For Google PPC, that takes more skill and I like marketing agencies for that. We've had good experiences with Asterisk Marketing. At the end of the day, any online lead source will depend on the strength of your scripting and ability to follow up.
