How are You Getting Listing Leads?

Advice/Question

What is working in your world for generating listing leads?

Upnest has been super solid for me, along with calling FSBO's. Expireds work sometimes. I also get decent lead flow off of social media posts.

I'd like to dramatically improve lead flow. I am considering Facebook/Google, but it seems SO saturated. (20+ Realtors show up under "Sponsored Real Estate Agents")

Zillow and Realtor dot com have been solid for lead flow, but it's all buyer leads. Nothing against those, I've always had a positive ROI, but between government shutdowns and cold feet, buyers are kind of for the birds right now.

So what is working for you? I'd love to add around 2-3 sellers per month to my lead flow.

IIRC, you're back in the market you worked in until about 2021...though I don't know how you were there before.

You can find your listing leads by staying in contact with your old customers (them), their friends (your old clients would recommend you), FSBO's and expireds, and by getting in front of (whatever that means to you) the people that are "more likely to sell". You can advertise the "best" listings you have to the neighbors, you can do Open Houses for other agents and market to the neighborhood.

I appreciate you following my story!

Sphere is always awesome, but Upnest and the internet in general has shown me people love clicking on stuff one way or another.

That was a market that was gaining steam versus going cold market!

You know deep down inside what you need to do. Embrace what needs to be done to get those 2-3 listing leads a month lol.

It beats your videos and you paying an arm and a leg for a cold footed buyer.

Paid ads are crazy oversaturated right now, across just about every platform so your messaging needs to be pretty dialed in. 70% of the referrals we make are for sellers. In paid channels you have to realize that, generally, consumers who show purchase intent (they are likely buyers) have a tendency to search for homes, so all of your keywords and messaging should center around that. On the flip side, sellers, exhibit a slightly different psychology...they shop for agents. So, if you intend to attract customers that are sellers then your messaging should speak to what sellers need. Put yourself into the mindset of a home seller and work backwards, think about how you would search and what you would value in an agent - then promote where your services align with seller intent/needs.

I hope this make sense. What I am getting at is that it's really hard to stand out in real estate but if you think deeply about what your customers really need you can invent new ways to stand out, especially to sellers.

Door knocking is the equivalent of having mini on the spot appointments with potential sellers. It's the hardest form of prospecting, therefore least competition, and most targeted. By far the most powerful method of finding sellers.

whoa. i never thought of this. do you just walk the entire block, knock every door and then ask if they're interested in selling? what kind of success rate do you get with that? i would think it varies noticeably and by neighborhood

Have you tried Goliath? CRM, lead data, and skip tracing all in one. Leads are found through live public records as they are released.

You might have to qualify via brokerage, but homelight does seller leads.

I have never had a solid lead from them. They send them all the time must of the time now I don't respond. Smh very weird, a few might answer a call or text but it's never serious. I guess worth a try though.

I know someone who lists about 15 houses a year via HL. I don't work with them though.

There are 1000 ways to get leads. If you want to get quality leads that come to you (vs you chasing them), you need to be the market authority of your area.

We get 2-3 random people who come to us each month to help them sell or buy, because they've been following our marketing and they believe we're the best option. It doesn't have to cost you anything but your time and creativity.

Even though Local Service Ads (the "Sponsored Real Estate Agent" ads) are oversaturated, I would still recommend doing it. Since it is a pay-per-lead program, there is no risk involved.

Google Ads (PPC) is also a very viable option. While it is mainly buyer leads, there are strategies you can use to try to get a listing (homeowners who need to sell, too) as well.

You can then layer on remarketing (Google & Meta) to target your database & website visitors.

Working on your Google Business Profile can also really help with free "seller leads".

I was in the same spot tons of buyer leads, very few sellers. Social content helped a bit, but it wasn't predictable. What really moved the needle was adding targeted outbound to homeowners likely to sell, paired with better data. I used CallingAgency for that, and the quality was noticeably better than generic lists or saturated ad platforms.

For rent by owner is a good source to build up an investors list, they own more than one home and the will sell eventually get 3-5 FRBO every day for one year and you don't need to work for the next 5 years

This question never really changes, just the tools..

FSBOs + expired's still work, but it feels like the biggest difference lately is how fast you actually reach people. A few minutes vs a few hours seems to matter way more than it used to.

Curious what others are seeing right now. Calling first or texting first? Both? And are listings coming from effort you control, or stuff you're paying for?
